PRINTMOBILE — INTAGLIO AND RELIEF

Two separate workshops of 20 hours each will be offered in Intaglio and Relief.

Intaglio

There are different forms of the intaglio technique but in each case the artist incises or erodes a metal plate — usually copper or zinc — with lines or pits that receive and trap the ink. It is, in fact, just the reverse principle of the relief method. If you think of the "in" in the word "intaglio" to mean bite into, you might find it easier to remember. The three major variations are: etching, drypoint and engraving.

Relief

In this method the artist uses some sort of cutting tool, such as a chisel, to remove or chip away the unwanted areas around his intended image. This leaves a raised surface which is then rolled with ink and pressed to paper. The pattern produced is usually bold and severe. If you have trouble visualizing this, think of the common rubber stamp that you press on an ink pad and then press on paper. A Japanese woodblock print is a good example of this method.

PRINTMOBILE — SILKSCREEN

Two separate workshops of 20 hours each will be offered in Silkscreening.

SILKSCREEN

The serigraph (seri, meaning silk and graph, to write) is actually the fine art term for the silkscreen print, or as it is now commonly called, the screen print. The screen print image is created when a closely-woven fabric, such as silk, is stretched over a wooded frame and areas of the image are blocked out or masked. The screen is brought into close contact with the paper and ink is then forced through the pores in the fabric with the aid of a rubber squeegee. Screen prints are becoming very popular.
